移民／難民とカタストロフィ

Migration and Catastrophes

Scope of the Conference (企画主旨)

Many recent catastrophes occasioned important movements of population.

These displacement of persons may be short lived, temporary or definitive, but in all cases the migration itself constitutes an important aspect of the catastrophe. This is clear, for example, in the case of the Fukushima Dai-ichi nuclear plant. The forced displacement of more than 170,000 persons is not external to the catastrophe, but part of what transformed that industrial accident, the meltdown of a nuclear reactor, into a catastrophe. The same may be said of the afflux of refugees that are today knocking at the door of Europe. Their migration may be a consequence of the war raging in Syria which in itself constitutes a catastrophe, but their forced displacement, first to refugee camps, and now the dangerous trek to Europe in search of a better life is an essential part of what that catastrophe is to them. The goal of this conference is to inquire into the relationship between migrations, catastrophes and justice. Migration inevitably occasion particular issues of justice, because unlike the 'original' catastrophe that caused the movement of population, it does not only concern others, the immediate victims of the catastrophe, but it inevitably also concerns "us", more precisely those among whom migrants now wish to settle. Migrations resulting from catastrophes, contrary to what may be imagined concerning the catastrophe itself, cannot simply be addressed in terms of humanitarian aid, they necessarily involve issues of reciprocity and justice.
