The current issue of the Ars Vivendi journal has 4 papers, including a special section featuring Disabled Woman and Sexuality.

Ignacio Calderón Almendros, who spent a few months with us in Institute of Ars Vivendi contributes to this volume by discussing the crucial relevance of education to overcome the discrimination and to promote the diversity in school (“Differences and Inequality in Schools: The language of oppressed people as hope”).

The paper by Elizabeth Depoy and others reports the results of the study checking the usability of a mobility device co-designed by users and researchers (“The development and testing of a contemporary co-designed mobility support to reduce abandonment and support outdoor fitness adherence”). For Japanese readers, I would like to stress the point that “designing” is not only for the research and development of new tools but also for changing our way-of-life, although the Japanese word “dezain” only has a very narrow meaning in the field of textiles.

For the special section, Julia Bahner (“Mapping the terrain of disability and sexuality: from policy to practice”) and Naoko Kawaguchi (“Difficulties disabled women in Japan face with regard to love, marriage, and reproduction”) are included, with a short and excellent introduction by You Tuchiya who planned and chaired the seminar on this topic at Aichi University.
